

Yet every year, approximately one million teenagers in this country become pregnant and 90 percent of those pregnancies are unintended.

Teenage girls have a higher risk of pregnancy complications, including maternal mortality and morbidity, miscarriages, still births, premature births and nutritional deficiencies than adult women.

Fewer than 60% of these teen mothers graduate from high school by age 25, and in addition to a lower educational status, early childbearing has an impact on the economic status of teens by affecting employment opportunities, marital options, and family structure.

Teen mothers are four times as likely as women who have their first child after adolescence to be poor in their 20's and early thirties, and are likely to have lower family incomes later in life.

In my home state of Texas, the birth rate for teenagers 15–18 years of age is 78.9%.

Although this is a decrease by 3.9% since 1991, far too many of our communities' children across the United States are having children of their own.

Teenage pregnancy and childbearing come hand in hand with a levels of risk for all involved.

We all carry the potential burden when children themselves have children, personally, societally and economically.

Our country spends more than $20 billion dollars each year assisting teen parents and their children.

Only through education and programs such as campaigns such as The National Campaign to Prevent Pregnancy, and a similar program through the Texas Southern University in Houston, Texas that focuses on the prevention of pregnancy in pre-adolescents and adolescents.

Our children and our adolescents carry the future of tomorrow. We must do everything we can to help our children prolong childbearing and parenting until they can truly be responsible adults and parents.

JASON HU—A MODERN DIPLOMAT WITH VISION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, in the April 10 edition of the Central Daily News, published in Taipei, there was an excellent article about Taiwan's Foreign Minister Jason Hu. Jason was the former Taiwan representative in Washington, D.C. and a friend to many of us on the Hill.

I would like to ask the permission to print the article, in an English translation by Professor N. Mao, for the reference of my colleagues and friends.

JASON HU—A MODERN DIPLOMAT WITH VISION

Will Jason Hu be the ruling Kuomintang candidate to run for Mayor of the city of Taipei?

This topic stirred up considerable speculation in the offices of the Taipei Economic Cultural Representative Office in Washington, D.C. Most of Jason Hu's former assistants professed high confidence in Jason Hu's waging a successful campaign for the job, but they would prefer to see Jason stay on as the Republic of China's Foreign Minister.

One close aide of Jason's commented that the Republic of China's diplomatic work needs someone like Jason, a non-career but highly innovative diplomat with fresh ideas and vision. Nearly all of Jason's former aides expressed the view that they would not want to see Jason leave his current post as Foreign Minister.

BREAKTHROUGH IN TAIPEI-U.S. RELATIONS

Will Jason Hu run for the office of the Mayor of Taipei? Someone who knows Jason well commented that Jason would not have any intention of running for the office, but if Jason were asked by the Kuomintang, Jason will run. Why? Jason is very loyal to the party.

If the Kuomintang can't find any other candidate to run for the office and if the Kuomintang leaders keep asking Jason to run, Jason will run.

Jason is not a career diplomat. During his tenure as Taipei's highest ranking diplomat in Washington, D.C., Jason shed outdated conventions and emerged a winner in gaining new friends for his country during a period of diplomatic low tide between Washington and Taipei.

In June 1996, Jason assumed the post as Taipei's representative in Washington, D.C. Immediately after arrival in Washington, he was an enthusiastic participant in activities sponsored by other diplomats, the U.S. Congress, think-tanks, international organizations, U.S. Government officials and any other persons or groups, whether or not their countries recognize Taipei.

He would meet with anyone if he thought that person would enhance Taipei's diplomatic interests. Jason is a man full of self-confidence, wit, humor, sincerity and considerable personal charm. During his short tenure in Washington, he was a highly visible diplomat and even earned the admiration of diplomats in the U.S. State Department for his professionalism. In fact, during Jason's fifteen months in Washington, he won the confidence of the United States Government, acceptance of the diplomatic corps, respect of the overseas Chinese in the United States and loyalty of his colleagues. He was also popular with the press.

It has been less than 8 years since Jason Hu entered government office.

When he first served as the government's spokesman, he impressed everyone with his leadership abilities. But what distinguished him the most was his service as Taipei's top diplomat in Washington. Before he came to Washington, Taipei maintained low-level contacts with the U.S. Government. But with Jason's efforts, within half a year after Jason's arrival in Washington, the level of contacts between Taipei and Washington was significantly upgraded. Moreover, being a non-career diplomat, Jason was an innovative diplomat with new ideas.

His activities in Washington extended far beyond traditional diplomatic circles; he had direct contacts with many international organizations stationed in Washington.

PERSISTENT JASON HU

A man full of self-confidence Jason is gifted with the ability to foster a favorable environment for talks with friends and strangers. For protocol reasons, he could not be formally addressed as "Ambassador Hu" in Washington but could be properly addressed as "Doctor Hu" of Oxford University.

No one could ignore his impressive Oxonian credentials. In 1995 Jason held a face-to-face dialogue with Dr. Kissinger and he equaled Kissinger in terms of knowledge and sharp analytical ability. Jason is a confident man but definitely not an arrogant man.

In fact, Jason can make any adversary happy to be in his company.

After a few witty introductory remarks, Jason will make his listener eager for more conversation. When the "chemistry" is right, Jason tries his best to persuade his adversary of his viewpoints. Even though differences of opinion may persist Jason never allows his adversary to feel confrontational.

Even though Jason Hu has left Washington for more than six months, friends still talk about his innovative personal style in approaching friends and foe.

Another characteristic of Jason's is his persistence. In April 1997, during Speaker
